

“I want to become a pharmacist,” says Pearl, 16. She’s head girl at her school in rural Zimbabwe, where climate shocks and chronic underfunding are threatening girls’ futures. She’s quick to identify what needs fixing to help girls thrive: more textbooks, more furniture. But the “biggest challenge”, she says, is “having to travel long distances from their homes to school”, which puts girls at risk of exploitation.

act:onaid

RUN FOR RIGHTS